

Dealing with Harassing Calls, Texts and Messages

Harassment via phone calls, text messages, and other communication platforms is a very common tactic of abuse. There are many ways to address this type of harassment, and it depends on what you want. Most people experiencing digital dating violence just want the harassment to stop, while others may want the person to be charged criminally and prosecuted. Some may want to increase the security and privacy of their technology to prevent or minimize the abusive person's contact. This handout will discuss the different options that you might pursue.

LEGAL OPTIONS

Depending on the method and extent of the harassment, legal remedies may be available. Legal options can be started by you (such as a Peace Bond requested by you and granted by a judge that can "keep the peace" and restrict the abusive person from doing certain things, such as coming near you or calling you. Note, if a Peace Bond is violated the behaviour can be charged as a crime). Other legal options involve a criminal investigation conducted by the police that may result in a criminal charge and prosecution of the abusive person. You would need to talk to Police or get legal advice if you want to explore these options.

For more information about a Peace Bond and how to apply, see our info sheet here.

Report to the police

If you report the harassment to the police they will investigate to determine whether the abusive person has committed a crime, such as criminal harassment, stalking or, based on other things that the abusive person is doing, whether another crime has been committed. When the police investigate they will collect and assess the evidence they can obtain to determine if a criminal charge is supported.

You may be able to help the police by providing documentation of the harassment. Keep in mind that this documentation is a piece of evidence that may show that a crime has occurred. The police will need to do their own investigation as well.

Document the harassment

Whether you seek a peace bond or report it to the police, having some documentation (collecting screenshots or recording date/time/notes for the abuse) of the abuse could be helpful. You may want to document the harassment because sometimes you may be the only person to have access to it, and depending on how the harassing messages occur or the technology platform in which it took place, the messages may be deleted and not retrievable later on.

Talk to the police, a lawyer, or anti-violence worker in your community to learn about what type of evidence would be most useful for whatever legal options you want to pursue. These professionals will have a more thorough understanding of local laws, local police, and court procedures.

For some people, documenting and keeping a record of the harassment they are experiencing may feel validating; but for others it may feel traumatic or triggering. Do what feels best for you. Speaking with an anti-violence worker or legal advocate may be helpful to consider your next steps.

For more information – see our handout on documentation tips and template. If you are not ready to talk to someone, check out our Preserving Digital Evidence Toolkit for more information and suggestions about how to document evidence and what to include.

REPORT HARASSMENT TO THE TECHNOLOGY COMPANY

You may also want to report the harassment to the technology company. Most technology companies have policies that do not allow users to misuse their platform to harass another person. If they confirm that someone is violating their policy by harassing another person through their platform, they may remove the offending message, tell the person to stop, and, in rare cases, the person may be banned from the platform.

Telephone Company

If the harassment is occurring via phone calls or text messages through a telephone provider, consider reporting it to your wireless company.

Reporting to the phone company may be an option if the harassment isn't at the point where the police can investigate. Keep in mind that through this process, the person making the harassing calls may be informed of who made the complaint – you. If you do not want the abusive person to know who made the complaint, this might not be the best option.

Social media

If the harassing message is made through a social media or a messaging app (such as Snapchat or Facebook messenger) you can report the harassment to the social media company. How the company responds to harassment will depend on their terms of use or community guidelines; in some cases, these guidelines may be narrowly defined and the harassment may not fall under their prohibited content. If the harassment is prohibited, the company may remove the offensive content and encourage you to block the harassing person. Tip: Always document the message and the profile information of the person sending or posting the messages before you report the message and the company removes it, as once a social media company deletes it, it is gone forever. In rare cases, the social media may suspend the harassing person's account.

STRATEGIES TO MANAGE HARASSING MESSAGES AND CALLS

Experiencing harassing calls and messages can be very difficult emotionally. It may feel as though the person is always there, you can't get away, and the only solution is to disengage from all technology so they can't contact you. While you can't make the other person stop harassing you, there may be some things that you can do to alleviate the constant bombardment of harassment.

Block the abusive person from contacting you

One of the strategies can be to block the abusive person from contacting you. You can block someone on your smartphone, through the telephone company, or on the social media platform. Blocking works differently depending on the technology platform or smartphone device, so it's important to test it so you know what to expect. Test the blocking feature with someone you trust to see how it works.

Keep in mind that there are limitations to blocking. When you block someone, you are blocking their ability to contact you via a particular phone number or social media account. They can still contact you on a different phone number or a social media account. It also prevents you from being able to see what they are posting about you.

On smartphones

Depending on the type of phone you have, you can block the other person in your phone settings to prevent them from contacting you. Generally, once blocked, any calls or text messages from the blocked phone number will not come through. However, blocking is going to be different on each phone, for example, the device may block incoming calls but not text messages or the blocked person may still be able to leave a voicemail but you won't get a notification. If you're not sure how to block on your phone, search "how to block a number on the make and model of your phone" on a platform like Google and if possible, test blocking to see how it works on your phone.

Through the telephone company

Another way to block someone from being able to call or message you is by contacting the telephone company and blocking a specific number there. Contact your phone company and ask how you can block a phone number from calling you.

On social media

If the abusive person is harassing you via a messaging or social media app, you can block that person through the social media or messaging app. Each social media has its own blocking feature and processes, so if you are unsure of how to block someone, search "How to block someone from the specific social media platform" on a platform like Google for instructions. Most social media companies have instructions at their help centre.

In general, most social media companies will not inform the other person that they have been blocked. However, the abusive person may realise that they are being blocked when they are unable to see your social media content or message you.

Not everyone wants to stop all contact with the harassing person. You may want to continue to have contact with the other person because you want to continue to collect evidence of the harassment. Or knowing what they are saying or doing helps you determine whether their behaviour will escalate. In some cases, you may need to stay in contact to communicate about the children, pets or other joint issues.

Use a specific ringtone for the abusive person

If you still need to stay in contact, but every time the phone rings it feels upsetting, one option is to use a specific ring tone for the abusive person. This way, when other people are calling, your phone will ring as normal. But when the abusive person calls, the special ringtone will alert you, and you can decide whether to answer it or silence your phone and ignore it.

Let the call go to voicemail

One common strategy is to let the calls go to voicemail. This lets you collect evidence of harassment, but you don't have to talk to the other person. Using this strategy along with giving the person their own ringtone will let you know whether to pick up the call or let it go to voicemail.

Get a second phone

Another strategy is to get a second phone. You can use one phone for the abusive person to contact you and another phone for everything else. This way, you're not cutting off all contact, but you can have a safer phone that you can use and you're not constantly bombarded with messages from the abusive person.

Forward calls from a specific phone number

Some phone companies have a feature that lets you forward calls from a specific number to another phone number. You can forward all calls and messages from the abusive person to another number, which means that even if they dial your number, your phone doesn't ring and you don't get the harassing text messages.

Get a new phone number or social media account

In some cases, you may decide to just get a new phone number or social media account. This option is best if you want to cut off all ties and want no communication with the abusive person, and you don't think the abusive person will learn about the new phone number or social media account. This solution isn't for everyone because it may be a lot of work to change your number or create a new social media account.

Another limitation to this option is that depending on your situation, it may be fairly easy for the abusive person to discover your new number or account – particularly if you have joint friends or family members – or if they have access to your accounts (such as email) or offices or organizations (health care offices, schools) where you updated your new number.

Make your number private

If you need to call the abusive person but don't want them to know about the new number, consider turning off your caller ID through your phone settings so it doesn't appear on the receiver's caller ID. The receiver will see "Private Number" or "Caller ID Not Available" on their phone when you ring.

You can also contact your wireless company to see if they have the ability to make your number "silent", so when you make a call, your phone number is masked.

If you don't want your number to be masked all the time, another option is to do this on a call-by-call basis. Each telephone company has its own code that you enter before you dial the number you are calling. Because each telephone carrier has its own code, contact your telephone provider for their caller ID blocking code.

If you or someone you know thinks they are experiencing digital dating violence, talk with a trusted adult or seek help from one of the organizations listed below. Often digital dating violence may be part of a continuum of gender-based violence that can be both online and in person.

You are not alone and there are confidential safe support services available for you.

- PEACE Program for Children and Youth is counselling program for children and youth experiencing violence.
- Kid Help Phone crisis line is available 24/7 by call or text.
- KUU-US Crisis Line Society is a crisis phone line for Indigenous Youth.
- VictimLink BC is a referral and information service for victims of crime.
- Society for Children and Youth BC's Child and Youth Legal Centre provides legal support for children and youth.

Spark Teen Digital Dating Violence Project

This document is a part of BCSTH's Teen Digital Dating Violence Toolkit for Teens. This document, or any portion thereof, may be reproduced or used in any manner whatsoever as long as acknowledgment to the BC Society of Transition Houses is included in the product.

This document was published March 2022.

Adapted for Canada with permission and in cooperation with the Technology Safety Project at WESNET, Australia.

